Supreme Court Creates New Normal for Homelessness in San Diego

Recently, the Supreme Court refused to hear a major case on homelessness, letting stand a ruling that protects homeless people's right to sleep on the sidewalk or in public parks if no other shelter is available.

While this has been the status quo in San Diego for several years, the court's decision confirms that this law will stay on the books for the foreseeable future. The City of San Diego, as well as the County and 18 other cities in the region, must provide shelter to the unhoused population if the City is to enforce quality of life ordinances such as prohibitions on sleeping on public sidewalks.

Now that the law is settled for the foreseeable future, it is vitally important that homeless outreach, safe parking, and other services be budgeted moving forward. With the recent work of the City and the Regional Task Force on Homelessness, the City is well positioned to create a responsive system that will ensure there is always a bed for those who find themselves on the streets. This system is designed to flow people through to permanent housing, and make sure time without shelter is brief.

San Diegans have to understand that this is the new normal. Sufficient funding must be included in the budget annually to ensure San Diego doesn't become San Francisco or Seattle, where rampant open drug abuse and the use of public streets as bathrooms is a casual fact of life.

Last year, the City Council passed a resolution to provide at least 140 new housing units for homeless and disabled residents by 2021. Unfortunately, despite all the talk, according to a recent news article, only three out of nine Council Districts are meeting their obligations; Districts 3, 7, and 8. District 6 is on track to meet its goals by 2021.

The time for sidestepping and punting on this issue is over. Every jurisdiction in San Diego must contribute to funding and operating a regional system that can move people off the streets and into housing so that we can enforce our quality of life and reclaim our public spaces.

San Diego Blood Bank Facing Critical Blood Shortage

The San Diego Blood Bank is currently experiencing a critical shortage of O positive and O negative blood. However, all blood types are needed and walk-ins are welcome.

Blood is a necessary medical treatment for individuals like Kamila with blood-related diseases. As part of her treatment for Thalassemia, Kamila receives blood transfusions every three to four weeks.

Thanks to blood donors, Kamila is able to enjoy her childhood.

Consider scheduling an appointment at a donor center or mobile drive near you today. Please call 619-400-8251 or visit SanDiegoBloodBank.org/donate.

So-Called “Compromise” Will Increase Cost of Housing

Recently, a Council majority approved an inclusionary housing amendment that will increase the cost of housing on struggling San Diego families. In the recent past, the City Council took steps forward by approving several measures that streamlined the housing permitting process. Unfortunately, this so-called compromise takes two steps back in the City’s fight against the housing crisis.

“A bad policy with small improvements is still bad policy,” said Councilmember Sherman.

While rent continues to increase, housing production in San Diego has been on a sharp decline since 2016. In fact, in 2017, production decreased by 2,300 units. In 2018, the City produced only half of what was constructed in 2016. Now is not the time to add burdensome mandates that further reduce new unit construction.

The measure passed will only add a miniscule number of affordable housing units that will do nothing to ease the multi-year waiting list. The only answer to solve the housing crisis is for supply to catch up with demand.

A better solution? Look to Grantville. A few years ago, the City approved the Grantville Focused Plan, which will eventually add as many as 8,275 housing units in the area. Instead of setting up costly roadblocks and regulations, the City streamlined the approval process for housing construction. As a result, 30% of new units in Grantville are considered affordable, without any mandates or fee increases.
